THE HIGGINSES OF BOHERNASOG

AN HIGH-PICTURE.
Seventy years ago there was not in this townland of Bohernabreena a better family than the Aherly ones, then granted on a lease for three lives to Patrick Higgins. No clause prohibiting subdivision was included in the lease; and long before the original leaseholder was gathered to his fathers, the sons began settling on the land. The second and third division was made for the husband of his eldest daughter, who came to reside in the house. Year by year, as families grew and marriages were contracted, the various divisions were further subdivided, until at the expiration of the lease Mr. Roberts, the landlord, found himself confronted by ten families, who claimed the right to be received as separate tenants. After some difficulty this proposal was accepted, but the original rent of 255 became £80, under the new arrangement, while the present rent is £155.

and the Christian names are no often repeated that if you want to find a Peter Higgins of Bohernasaggarrh you must know the man you require is Old Peter; or Peter Jack; or Peter mor, "big Peter;" Petercen, "little Peter;" or black Peter; or red Peter; Peter the lord, so named from his hump on his back; or Peter-mumps, "Peter with the mouth"—a feature so enormous that it might with reason be called the mouth with Peter.

house in which he lives was built by him
 5. the other in his marriage that portion house in which he lived was built by his father when on his marriage that portion of land was allotted to him. It is a cabin consisting of a single room. The walls are made of tempered mud mixed with straw, and the floors are made of mud. The walls are so moist and slimy that patters upon their unwashed faces. In this one room is a bedstead, raised about eighteen inches from the mud floor, on which a feather bed is placed over a thick layer of straw, and in this bed sleeps every member of the family—Malachi Higgins, his wife, and the girls. Malachi Higgins says that he has never heard of any other man before his father succeeded in purchasing a bed the father adhered to the primitive custom of sleeping "stradowne." At night, rushes and ferns being spread up the floor, the husband and wife lay down in the middle, the youngest girl next the mother, and the youngest boy next the father, and the other children were the young "mau" of the farm, and the young women, strangers sleeping on the outside of their respective sexes. The bedstead being raised six or eight feet the ground affords a comfortable place where the pigs can sleep, and in winter the additional warmth supplied by the straw. The apartment is large enough to accommodate the cow and the ass, so Malachi Higgins says no necessity for erecting a shed for their useful beasts. Malachi Higgins has had five children, of whom seven are now alive. Each year, as soon as the ground has been dug up in the spring work his sons go out to the fields and they may be seen in the English harvest has been gathered, and return in the winter, during which they do no work and are ready to join any mischief offering excitement or profit. They bring home with them the worst vices of the lowest class in England, and, having lived a playish life all the summer, sleeping in barns and on the ground, they are not fit to be taken into the long-lost feel for Father Tom Ryland, the reverend laws with which they knelt to him in childhood. They have never been to school as unfortunately the patron of the near-by National school employed a teacher who received a first-class certificate from the Government Training School for National Schools, and the National school was in a position having been placed under the ban of the Church, Father Ryland ordered that children should attend the school while teacher remained, and, as the patron refused to yield; the benefits of education were henceforth to be for many children in that parish. One daughter, Judy, emigrated to America years ago and is now in service in New York. Another daughter, Mary, who is now married, comes to share the single room, and, by arrangement arranged by Father Tom Elyan, Monaghan has one son apart for his own use.

As long as Higgins can remember, the acres have been under grass and the potatoes had borne alternate crops of oats and potatoes. With the one exception that the land has been turned up by the spade instead of the plough, cultural neglect could be the farther in preventing the proper turn of either crop. As the land is turned up the sod is white with the roots of bitweed or wild convolvulus, which propagates with amazing rapidity, and almost strangles the growing crop in its embrace. But, weeding, except of the most artificial character; does not in Malaga Higgins's mind come within the meaning of agricultural operations. His fence is a broad, level, grassy slope, the sides of which are carried far upon the natural breezes, and liable to swell the army of weeds that consumes one third of the small farmer's crop. There is another cause that may count for the extraordinary difference between the yield of his crops and those of great farmers of the district. He adopts a principle of selector and survival of the fittest, and he has no objection to the birds he feeds the black ones to the pigs and keds, for he serves the tabers too small for sale. His seed ones are never changed: and he would that his returns steadily diminish. It is not until surpring that Maluchi oves the years' rent, and already visions of pbe evioion present themselves. Mr. Roberts has intimated to him that he must have a new house, and that he must be content that his non-in-law, Monaghan, is trying to supplant him, as he heard that you may declare when coming home drunk from market that he could borrow the rent if he liked. Judy has written, enclosing a police order for £3, as that faithful girl has often done before; and, though she cannot exactly say what her father is to do when she is asked to leave, she knows that she must emigrate, and offers to send a free passage for her sister Maluchi at one penny evenning on the broken fence over against the battered cabin and its stagnant dung-pit, and he thought over Judy's proposition. If he could get Mr. Roberts' consent to the interest in his farm, he would probably be able to get the money that would suffice to take himself, and his wife, to America. But Mr. Roberts is a hard man and would not allow any tenant to sell an interest; and as Maluchi sat on the fence his thoughts went back over the years he spent in Bohernasogarrath. Again he thought of Willie and Mary running out from the back of the house, and the water dripping by seeping up the green water from the dung-pit in a broken bowl, and pouring over their bare feet. Nora rose before him ragged and unkempt, her single garment tattered grey, scarce hiding her attenuated limbs—dirty little Nora, with her grizzled face and bright blue eyes, who long years ago crept into the house, and who had been his wife. His work was done, and told him for the first time that she was "tired playing." He went over the after-school when her lips were burning, and her eyes more bright, and he remembered with indignity he heard from the poor-law guards that he could not have a visiting licence; the dispensary doctor told him he was not fit to be a father, and he had to see the dispensary until he obtained a pound with which to tempt the doctor to come out at night to save his child. How, unfortunately, he had
